

In this talk, I will discuss the modelling of radial gradients in metallicity and dust in local spiral galaxies, focusing on NGC 628, one of the best examples for which spatially-resolved observations of all these quantities are available. In particular, I will focus on what these gradients can tell us about the role of the different processes that shape the dust content in galaxies, which is to date one of the most urgent astrophysical questions.